Joint ventures (JVs) are an increasingly popular form of business partnership on renewable energy projects, and play an important role in the energy transition process.

Should a JV partner with an offshore wind farm?

For example, the broad experience of offshore activity in deep water, harsh environment operations and floating structures, along with their access to vast funds, is spurring further growth in offshore wind farms. While JV partnering presents clear benefits, interested parties should be aware of potential risks and mitigating measures.

Can a JV partner be a supplier?

It is common on renewable energy projects for one of the JV partners (or an affiliated company) to be a supplier, operator and/or contractor on the project, particularly where it provides the technology.

What happens if a JV partner disputes a project's scope of work?

Disputes can arise between JV partners absent a clear allocation of risk and delineation of responsibilities in connection with the project's scope of work. This is particularly relevant on renewable energy projects, where untested technology may increase the risk of cost overruns and delay.
